THE HAGUE, March 7—A recent report by the United Nations warns that the world could be facing a water crisis in 25 years.

By 2025, the report predicts, the world's population of six billion people will have increased by three billion, and we will thus need a 20-percent increase in fresh water.

A UN official pointed out that one problem is the lack of a law governing the allocation of international waters. "At least 214 rivers flow through two or more countries worldwide," she said, "but there is currently no law governing the use of these waters."

In the Mid-East, for example, Israel, Jordan, Lebanon, and Syria all draw water from the Jordan and Yarmuk rivers, while in Asia, the Ganges supplies both India and Bangladesh. Furthermore, dam projects being carried out in mainland China, Laos, and Thailand will likely impact water supplies in Vietnam and Cambodia.

Africa, however, is the area of greatest concern, as 19 of the world's 25 "thirstiest" countries are located there. In Ethiopia, for example, millions of people could starve this year because of drought.

What would be a good title for this article?

- A. Nations Agree About Use of International Waters
- B. Water, Water Everywhere and Not a Drop to Spare
- C. Dam Projects Spark UN Debate Over Water Use
- D. UN Warns of Water Crisis in 25 Years
